Winona and Ted Are Married

After an interview with Granville Barton for the Chronicle, Laurel Stone falls in love with him, and when he asks her to marry him she consents. Later she discovers that he does not love her. Laurel has lived before her marriage with another newspaper woman, Winona Bell, and Winona spends her vacation at Laurel's place, "The Cedars."

CHAPTER XXII

SO INADVERTENTLY Laurel had a great deal to do with the subtle change that had taken place in Winona. The note that she received from Winona a few days after that young woman's departure from the Cedars was a revelation. Laurel read it in the seclusion and marveled—and envied in spite of herself.

"I don't know what has come over me," the note ran. "I must have absorbed some of your optimism when I was at The Cedars, but Ted insists that I marry him immediately and after all, what is the use of waiting?"

Laurel let the loose pages with The Chronicle in plain black type across the top of each fall to her lap, while she mused. Winona and Ted were going to be married. Winona made fifty dollars a week on the Chronicle, and Ted made seventy-five. They could have a splendid apartment with their joint salaries, and what a lot of fun they would have planning it and buying the splendid home with its expensive chintzes and its furniture bought for every comfort and regardless of expense. There was an emptiness about it that chilled her heart. It wasn't a home. And Winona after all would have the very best in life, everything that goes to make up happiness.

When Laurel told Granville that she was going up to Winona's marriage, he smiled cordially. There was nothing of the snob about him. He had no objection to Laurel's friendship for Winona. In fact, he rather liked Winona's independence. It was that very quality that he had admired in Laurel. It was the bright light of the working woman.

It was just after dinner and Granville was smoking a cigar in the library. Laurel in a soft white dress sat just without the circle cast by one of the huge lamps. Flecks of light caught at her dress and made silver patterns on it. She was vaguely lovely and mysterious. "It's going to be a very small wedding," she explained. "They're to be married at 12 o'clock and afterward there will be a small luncheon. I shall be back to dinner."

"Fine," he said approvingly. "I believe we go to the Hutchinsons that night." "Yes, we do." There was a silence.

"Oh," he said after a moment, "we'll give her something handsome of course." "I thought of a lamp. She admired that one by the staircase so much."

"Fine." And the subject was closed. It was significant that Granville saw nothing of Laurel's attitude toward him. She was gracious, she was efficient, the children loved her, and he noticed nothing because she was too clever and too proud to show him or any one that she was not perfectly contented. She was waiting, waiting, planning a big coup or she could not have borne it at all.

Laurel was not the kind of a woman who could sit back and be martyred even for the man she loved.

Winona's marriage was very simple. She was married in one of the big silent churches, with only Tom Benton and Laurel present. It was significant that Laurel and Tom Benton should stand up together behind Winona and Ted. Laurel knew that the big man had cared for her, that his gruffness was partly a mask for his feelings and that his heart was as soft as a baby's.

Afterward they had a wedding luncheon in one of Mucci's private dining rooms. Winona wished it that way, for she preferred it, she said, to any other place. Although the table linen was coarse and the room shabby, Mucci himself saw that the wedding luncheon was what it should be.

Laurel was conscious that Tom Benton was very quiet, and that Ted could hardly remove his eyes even for a moment from his wife. Winona pretended not to notice, but once Laurel saw their eyes meet and the look in Winona's was not for outsiders to see. Winona looked very smart. That seemed such a splendid adjective with which to describe Winona, for she was always that. Her gloves were always fresh, her feet were always exquisitely neat, and she wore little straw hats with spring flowers on them when the snow was still on the ground. Her hands were white and slim and on the third finger of the left hand gleamed a slender golden band, above which was a diamond cluster ring. It was a pretty ring, the stones were good and it was well set. Laurel looked down at her own fingers folded in her lap. The ruby smoldered and sparkled up from the darkness like an evil eye. Even with no other jewels on her hands it seemed to weigh her slim finger down like a weight.

The Opening Exposition of Spring Millinery Is Aglow With Color

Sunshine itself seems to radiate from these fresh Spring hats of glistening straw and nodding flowers, and what a refreshing sight it is! After the first glimpse, one forgets all about Winter and gray skies and slushy streets, and visions of a "cleaner, greener land" take their places.

Or, more tailored, a shining black straw toque with a high cockade of glistening feathers. On many of these tailored hats to be worn with street suits there is a pronounced fancy for lacquered wings and feathers.

Prices on these charming Springtime hats start at $9.50 and there is delightful choosing around $12.50 and $15.
